Taking us from the Campsie Fells and Ben Lomond which Bridgland can see from her own home up to the islands of Skye and Harris via the 'Road to the Isles', this collection tells a series of stories of moments of reflection showing what it was like to be in a particular place at a particular time. She uses the tactile, textural qualities of the oils to build up each painting, using a wide variety of impasto mark-making to give a sense of the energy and vitality of the landscape.

"The subject matter of my paintings has gained a real intensity, with a focus on the abundance of the natural world and the seasons and rhythms of nature which just keep going, despite everything, in a demonstration of hopefulness and joy. Small things which might have been seen before as too mundane, too ordinary – wildflowers, a hedgerow, marks in the sand, waves on the shore, the patterns of crops, a sunset - now have an increased importance and significance. They have become things to treasure."
